Excerpt: . . . 11 In 1994, users of water and power from the lower Colorado River began to become concerned about our ability to continue to rely on the rivers resources in the face of growing concerns about the en-dangered species, and as a result we have now spent the last 10 plus years working together with Federal and non-Federal partici-pants to complete the documents now to put the Lower Colorado River Multi-Species Conservation Program into place. The Secretary approved the program in April of 2005, and of course in August of that year the White House recognized the pro-gram as an exemplary environmental initiative. Fifty Federal and non-Federal entities have come together to craft and fund a program that protects 26 endangered, threatened and sensitive spe-cies, and provides for the acquisition, creation and maintenance of over 8, 000 acres of high quality habitat and then provides for the rearing and stocking of hundreds of thousands of two species of en-dangered fish. Before the Federal government would approve the program, how-ever, the non-Federal participants were required to agree uncondi-tionally to fund half of the total program, which is a cost of about 626 million, indexed for inflation over 50 years. The CAP of course is one of those funding mechanisms. In return for this commitment, non-Federal water and power users were granted a Federal permit under the ESA Act that allows for the essential functions as water and...
